PREFACE

The Central Intelligence Agency's History Staff has prepared this biographical handbook on the Directors and Deputy Directors of Central Intelligence principally as a reference aid for CIA, the Intelligence Community, and other offices of the U.S. Government. It is a revision of the History Staff's 1983 publication, Directors and Deputy Directors of Central Intelligence: Dates and Data 1946-1983, which it supersedes.

This edition includes General William J. Donovan, who headed the United States' first independent intelligence organization during the Second World War. This forerunner of CIA was first formed as the Office of the Coordinator of Information by President Franklin D. Roosevelt's directive of 11 July 1941, and then reorganized and renamed the Office of Strategic Services by a presidential directive of 13 June 1942. As Coordinator of Information General Donovan reported directly to the President, and as Director of Strategic Services he served under the direction of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, until President Harry S. Truman disbanded the OSS just after the end of the war. At CIA's Headquarters, General Donovan's portrait hangs with those of the former Directors of Central Intelligence, and it is these portraits that are reproduced in this book.

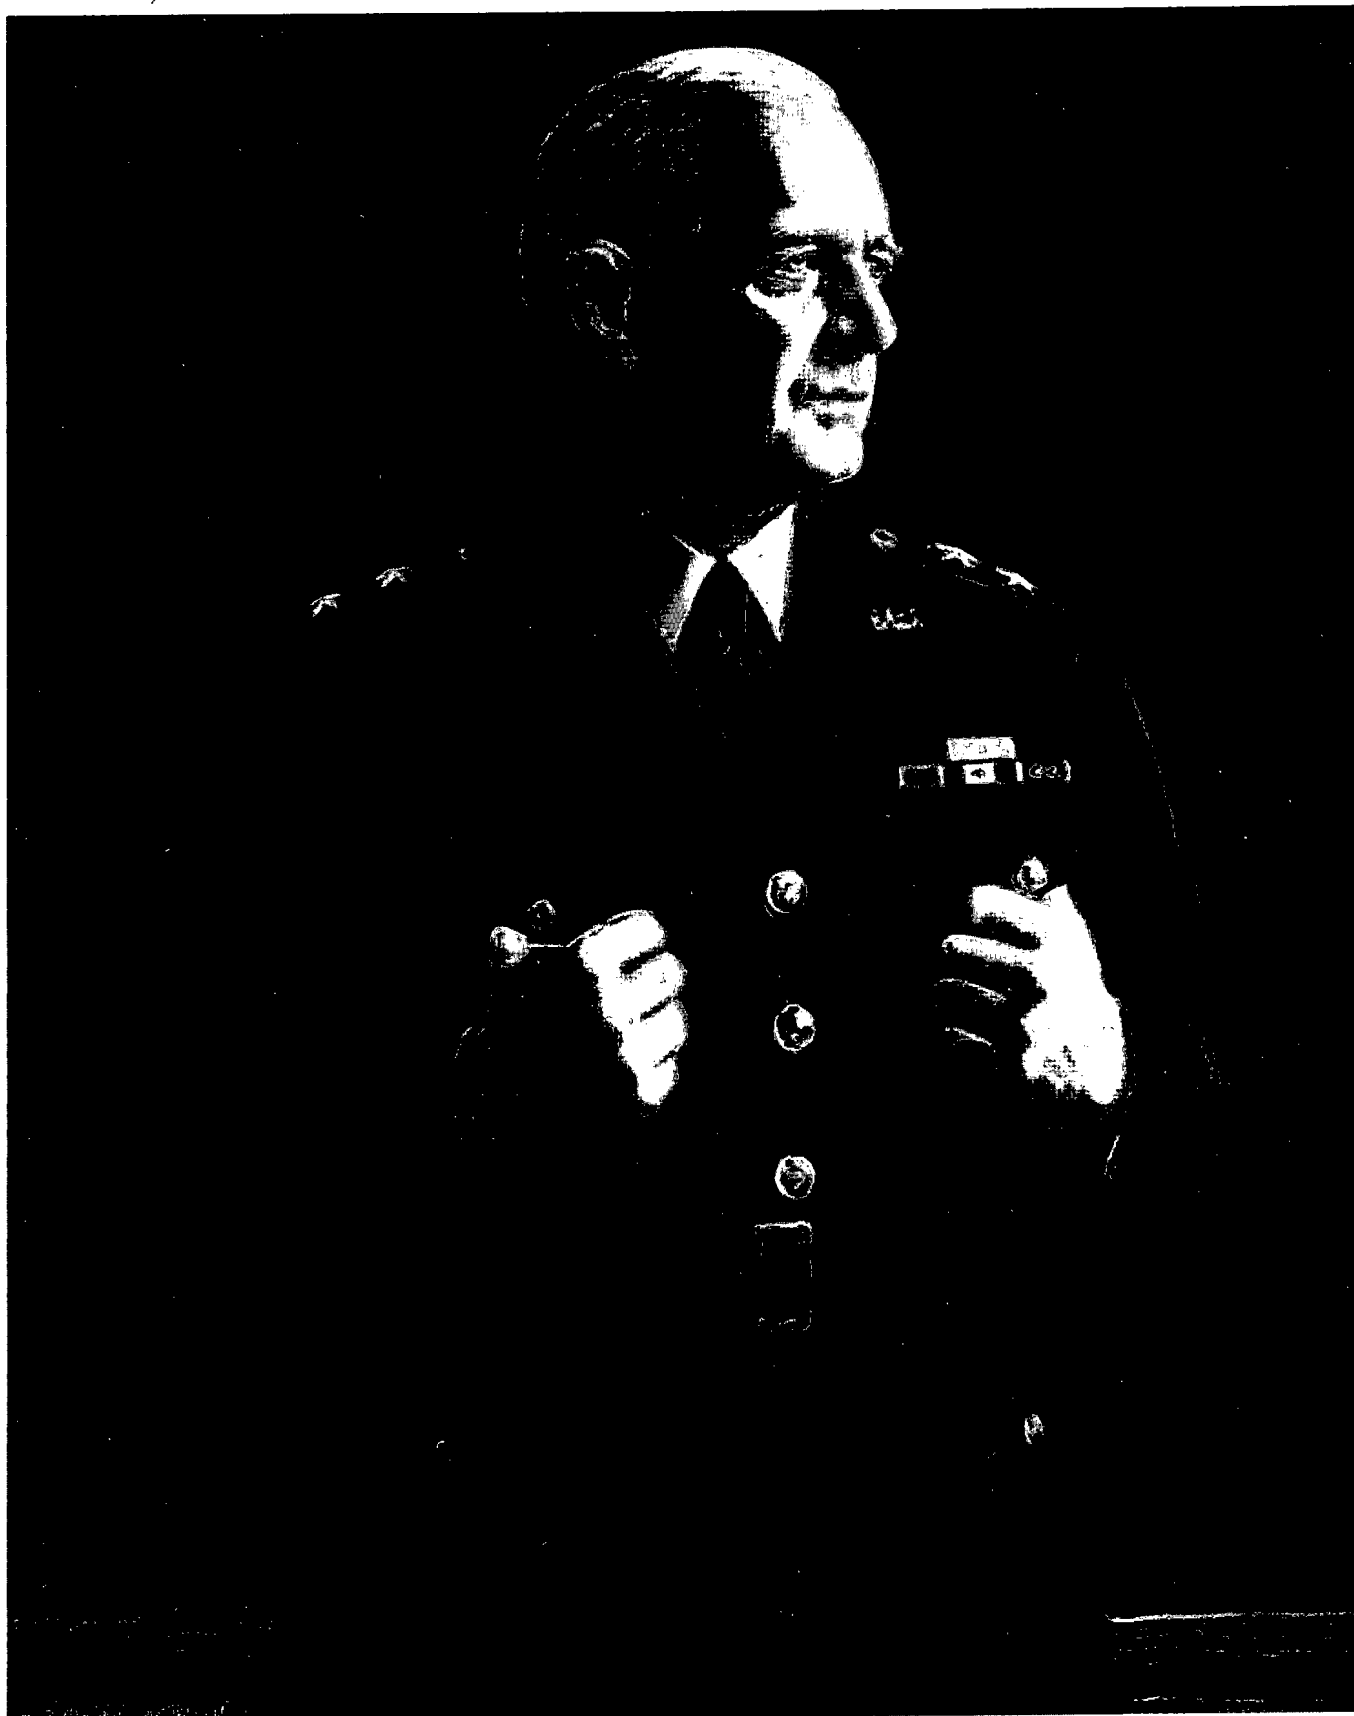

Having disbanded OSS on 1 October 1945, President Truman established the Central Intelligence Group (CIG) on 22 January 1946. Although drawing its budget and staff from the several departments that maintained intelligence services, this new organization was headed by a Director of Central Intelligence (DCI), who was appointed by the President to serve under the supervision of a National Intelligence Authority, made up of the Secretaries of State, War and Navy, and the President's personal representative. Thus, there was a Director of Central Intelligence almost two years before there was a Central Intelligence Agency.

The CIA was established by the National Security Act of 26 July 1947. This Act went into effect 18 September 1947, a birthday CIA shares with the U.S. Air Force and the National Security Council, both also created by this Act. Admiral Roscoe Hillenkoetter, whose tenure as third DCI spanned both CIG and CIA, was reappointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, as the new Act required. The Director of Central Intelligence now became the primary adviser to the President and the National Security Council on national foreign intelligence matters. Today the DCI is the head of the Central Intelligence Agency and of such other staff elements as are required for the discharge of his Intelligence Community responsibilities. Executive Order 12333 of 4 December 1981 gives the DCI authority to develop and implement the National Foreign Intelligence Program budget, and to coordinate the tasking of all Intelligence Community collection elements.

The office of Deputy Director of Central Intelligence (DDCI) evolved gradually under CIG and CIA. Until 1953 Deputy Directors were appointed by the Director. The first Deputy, Kingman Douglass, served only in an acting status for less than five months in 1947, and for long periods CIG had no Deputy Director. It was General Walter Bedell Smith, the fourth DCI, who established the Deputy Director of Central Intelligence in the role he has since played in CIA. Congress recognized the importance of the position in April 1953 by amending the National Security Act of 1947 to provide for the appointment of the Deputy Director of Central Intelligence by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate; General Charles Pearre Cabell, USAF, DDCI from 1953 to 1962, was the first to be so appointed. The 1953 amendment also provided that commissioned officers of the armed forces, whether active or retired, could not occupy both DCI and DDCI positions at the same time. This provision made it mandatory that Lieutenant General Marshall Carter, USA, resign as DDCI when President Johnson appointed Vice Admiral William Raborn, USN (Ret.) to succeed Mr. John McCone as DCI. The DDCI assists the Director by performing such functions as the DCI assigns or delegates. He acts for and exercises the powers of the Director during his absence or disability, or in the event of a vacancy in the position of the Director. Four DDCIs have served as Acting Directors of Central Intelligence when the Director's position was vacant: Allen Dulles, Vernon Walters, Henry Knoche, and Robert Gates.
